

Chapter 1474 Is He Here To Drive Her Away

---

When Brandon found that Janet was still in the building and hadn't been abducted, he breathed a sigh of relief. Nevertheless, he was still anxious.

Even though Janet had lost her memory, she had always been sensible and obedient. She wouldn't disappear for no reason, knowing it would only stir up worry and concern among those who cared for her. Hence, something must have happened to her that made her hide and not want to appear.

Thinking that the examination room was the last place Janet showed up, Brandon told others to continue looking for her while he headed over there.

However, to his disappointment, Janet was nowhere to be seen.

"Damn it!" Frowning, Brandon was in a fit of panic. "Janet, where the hell did you go?"

Right then, he heard some noise behind him. Turning around, he saw several nurses walking past him sneakily.

Noticing that he had seen them, the nurses froze and looked at him in fear. "Hello, Mr. Larson..."

It was them who gossiped at the door of the lounge

Noticing that he had seen them, the nurses froze and looked at him in fear. "Hello, Mr. Larson..."

It was them who gossiped at the door of the lounge previously.

They had thought that Janet was probably an imposter who was trying to be a rich lady, so they badmouthed her freely. They couldn't even be bothered to know if Janet was in the lounge.

After all, in their eyes, Janet was a fake, so they weren't afraid of her telling on them.

However, when the nurses heard that Brandon had sent out all his men to search for Janet after she went missing and that even the Johanna and Beal had looked for her in person, they were finally scared.

Facing the most powerful man in Barnes at this moment, they were shaking like leaves.

Everyone in the city knew how much Brandon loved his wife. If he found out that they had something to do with Janet's disappearance, they were going to be done for.

Although Brandon didn't know what the nurses were thinking about, he sensed something was wrong upon seeing their guilty and panicky looks. "Where is my wife?" he asked, his gaze darkening.

Under his fierce eyes, the nurses' legs turned to jelly at once.

One of them shook her head and replied tremblingly, "We... We don't know."

Seeing how flustered they were, Brandon immediately realized that they might have something to do with Janet going missing.

Staring daggers at them, he asked, "I'm giving you the last chance. Where is my wife? Shoot!"

One of the nurses was so frightened that she fell to the floor. The others also almost dropped to their knees. "O-Okay, we'll say! Actually..."

It wasn't until Brandon heard the whole story that he finally knew what had happened.

It turned out that the nurses had assumed Janet was an imposter just because of a text message and even deliberately gave her a hard time.

When Brandon thought about how sad and fearful Janet was after hearing the nurses' words, his eyes were filled with rage. Sparing a glance at the terrified nurses, he uttered frostily, "You're fired!" Then he turned around and strode toward the lounge.

The nurses collapsed to the floor in despair. The hospitals under the Larson Group were the best in the whole of Barnes. Now that they had been sacked, no other hospitals would want to hire them for fear of offending the Larson Group.

Hence, their dismissal was equivalent to being banned from the medical industry.

After entering the lounge, Brandon opened the doors to the cubicles one by one. However, Janet wasn't in any of them. Only when he found the door of the last cubicle was locked did he feel relieved.

It seemed that Janet was inside.

"Janet, are you in there?" Brandon adjusted his voice and comforted her gently, "It's late now. Why aren't you going back? Were you bullied? Tell me. I'll stand up for you, okay? Don't sulk anymore."

Janet curled up in the corner of the cubicle, overwhelmed by great sadness. When she heard Brandon's gentle voice, her lashes trembled. Nevertheless, instead of responding to him, she continued to sob.

Actually, she had heard Brandon when he was checking the other cubicles earlier, but she dared not answer. The fear of being abandoned at any time gripped her heart tight. She was afraid that Brandon had come here to drive her away.

However, tears misted over her eyes even more when she heard Brandon comforting her.

Deep down, she knew that all of his love and affection belonged to his missing wife, and it was highly possible that she wasn't the one he was looking for.

Thinking of this, Janet couldn't help sobbing and trembling with a great wrench of sadness.
