

Chapter 907 Do You Believe Me

Disregarding Aeneas, Liam directed his attention to Watkins.

Liam handed the one million dollars that Carsen had brought to Watkins. He said, "Take this money for your wife's treatment. If it falls short, don't hesitate to ask for more."

Since the moment Watkins had set aside his pride and implored Aeneas, Liam had recognized the immense hardship he was enduring. Liam had no intention of holding Watkins to repaying the one million dollars.

With his eyes brimming with tears, Watkins felt profoundly moved and promptly responded, "One million is excessive! The entire treatment costs just two hundred thousand. I'll only borrow two hundred thousand. I'll repay you in the future!"

As Watkins spoke, he took a step back, trying to bow to Liam in gratitude.

Observing that, Liam stopped Watkins and smiled reassuringly.

"Watkins, you've endured so much these past years. Don't worry. A brighter future awaits you! I've given you the money, and there's no need for you to repay

Surveying the one million dollars before him, Watkins hesitated and protested, "This is just too much! I can't accept it!"

Observing Watkins's reluctance, Liam chuckled and said, "Watkins, you used to preside over a multi-billion-dollar conglomerate. How have you become so timid? I just want to ask, do you trust me?"

Upon hearing that, Watkins swiftly nodded, unwavering in his belief, and affirmed, "I trust you!"

With Watkins's unequivocal vote of confidence, Liam nodded with a genial grin and proclaimed, "Since you trust me, then accept the one million. Kingland Group will soon be on the path to return to its rightful owner."

After his declaration, he continued, "When that time comes, I'll require your expertise to oversee the company. Consider this money a down payment for your role as the top executive."

Upon hearing Liam's words, hope gleamed in Watkins's eyes.

For years, he had weathered a series of failures, gradually losing sight of his former self and embracing the mantle of a defeated man.

However, Liam's return rekindled his sense of identity and purpose.

It invigorated him like a shot of adrenaline, rekindling the hope he had long lost.

It was all thanks to Liam that he could glimpse the flicker of hope once more.

With that in mind, he resolved to labor diligently for Liam's cause.

This time, he accepted the one million dollars and said, "Liam, call me when you require my services. I'll head to the hospital to attend to my wife now."

Liam responded with a nod and a smile. After watching Watkins depart, Liam prepared to enter Kingland Group.

At that moment, Carsen inquired, pointing at the unconscious Aeneas, "Mr. Hoffman, what shall we do with this man?"

Aeneas had become useless to Liam's objectives now.

Liam responded nonchalantly, "If you're feeling bored, let him remain here, naked, and kowtow for an entire day! I'm off to meet someone."

Upon hearing that, a malevolent grin curled across Carsen's lips as his gaze settled upon Aeneas. He entertained a slew of sinister ideas.

Carsen then roused Aeneas from his stupor and initiated his torment.

Meanwhile, in the top-floor boardroom of Kingland Group, a meeting took place.

The company's senior executives convened for their assembly.

They engaged in a discussion regarding the enigmatic figure known as the five-star general.

Gallagher, the Chairman of the Board, spoke in a deep voice. "Salem has been far from tranquil lately. The five-star general has targeted the Williams family and the Ortiz family, causing both families to crumble. Do any of you possess knowledge about the true identity of the five-star general?"

The attendees looked at each other with puzzled expressions.

Since the advent of the five-star general, he had never willingly revealed his identity. How could they possibly

At that moment, the meeting room's door was swung open abruptly.

It prompted Gallagher to prepare to unleash a tirade. However, his ire swiftly dissipated upon realizing that the individual entering was none other than his nephew, Liam.
