No matter how well Mandy hid her feelings, they couldn't slip past Janet's watchful gaze.

Janet observed the disappointment etched across Mandy's face and felt a wave of sympathy. She had witnessed the bullying Mandy endured at Della's hands.

Della's arrogance and harshness were unbearable, and it was clear Mandy felt aggrieved.

Janet's heart went out to her. She longed to offer comfort and even to help Mandy get back at Della.

Mulling it over, Janet leaned closer and murmured, "I've got a plan to get back at her. Interested?"

Mandy's eyes lit up with a spark of interest. "Really? What's your plan?" she inquired, her voice laced with curiosity.

Despite her distaste for Della, Mandy had to admit that not all of Della's taunts were unfounded. She was younger and from a family that had seen better days. Clashing with Della would only bring trouble to the Hamilton family. Della's torment had become a constant thorn in her side.

"But don't you want to stand up for yourself? I thought you were tough," Janet teased, a playful smile dancing on her lips.

Perhaps swayed by Janet's encouragement, Mandy's curiosity peaked. "Alright, spill it. What's this plan of yours?"

Janet leaned in, her voice a conspiratorial whisper, and shared her scheme.

As Mandy listened, her brows knitted together in concern. "Do you really think that'll work?" she asked, her voice tinged with skepticism.

"Of course!" Janet said, confidence laced in her voice. "Trust me."

"I'm not sure it's the right approach for me," Mandy confessed, still unsure.

Janet, sensing Mandy's hesitation, tried a different tactic. "If you're not up for it, that's fine. Just consider today's ordeal a lesson," she said with a shrug.

Mandy's expression tightened, her frustration evident. "Who says I'm scared? It's just that I prefer to deal with things head-on, not sneak around behind someone's back."

True to her word, Mandy had always faced things directly, eschewing petty backbiting since her school

Janet saw the flicker of resolve in Mandy's eyes, her strategy clearly having the desired effect.

Before Mandy could second-guess herself, Janet presented a more palatable option.

"The Ocean Heart was entrusted to you by Locke. With it gone, doesn't it make sense to inform him? Bringing it to Locke's attention is the right move."

After a moment of reflection, Mandy nodded, her decision made. "You've got a point," she agreed, finally seeing the logic in Janet's words.
