Janet felt a rush of emotion. She turned, placed a hand over Brandon's mouth, and whispered shyly, "Please don't talk like that again. Be careful, or the baby might hear you and get upset."

Brandon stroked her belly, grinning as he replied, "If our little one overhears, then let it be. Just know that you're always the most important person to me."

When Johanna and Beal came back from the banquet and were about to check if Janet had eaten, they caught sight of the couple cozied up on the sofa, deep in conversation. It was clear they had reconciled.

Relieved by the scene, they exchanged a few words with them before everyone retired to their rooms for the night.

In the quiet of their room, Janet sat on the bed's edge, browsing through design books as was her habit. To her delight, she picked up a book on children's clothing design—Elizabeth had sent it, and Brandon had placed it there, knowing she enjoyed reading before sleep.

Touched by his thoughtful gesture, Janet's face lit up with a smile.

After his shower, Brandon joined her, prompting her to ask, "By the way, what color do you like? I'm planning to design a matching set for the whole family. We could each have our own."

Brandon glanced at her still-flat belly, then hesitated before saying, "Don't you think it's a bit early to start planning these? Maybe we should wait until we know the gender or until after the baby is born. Plus, you really shouldn't overdo it."

"Isn't it too late once the baby is born?" Janet asked quietly.

Brandon, suddenly enthusiastic, leaned in closer and suggested, "If you're getting bored, why not start by designing some matching outfits for us? Once the baby arrives, you can make something in the same style for them. What do you think?"

Janet replied, "No, I only want to design for our child. If you're looking for custom clothes, maybe you should find another high-end designer. I simply don't have the time for that."

Brandon pursed his lips and held back any further comments.

Thanks to the care of expert obstetricians and nutritionists, Janet's health was excellent.

Two weeks later, Brandon accompanied Janet to Frank's hospital for a check-up. Once they confirmed everything was fine with her and the baby, Janet asked if they could go shopping for a few hours.

She had been staying at her parents' villa for a month and was bored.

Brandon laughed and ruffled her hair, saying, "Of course we can."

Janet brushed his hand away and suggested, "How about we have lunch outside today?"

Even though the White family's chef was hired from a fancy restaurant, Janet occasionally craved a meal out.

Seeing the hopeful look on her face, Brandon couldn't say no. He immediately drove her to the restaurant she had picked out.

Upon arriving, they noticed a disheveled middle-aged man waiting anxiously in a corner, casting glances towards a table by the window.

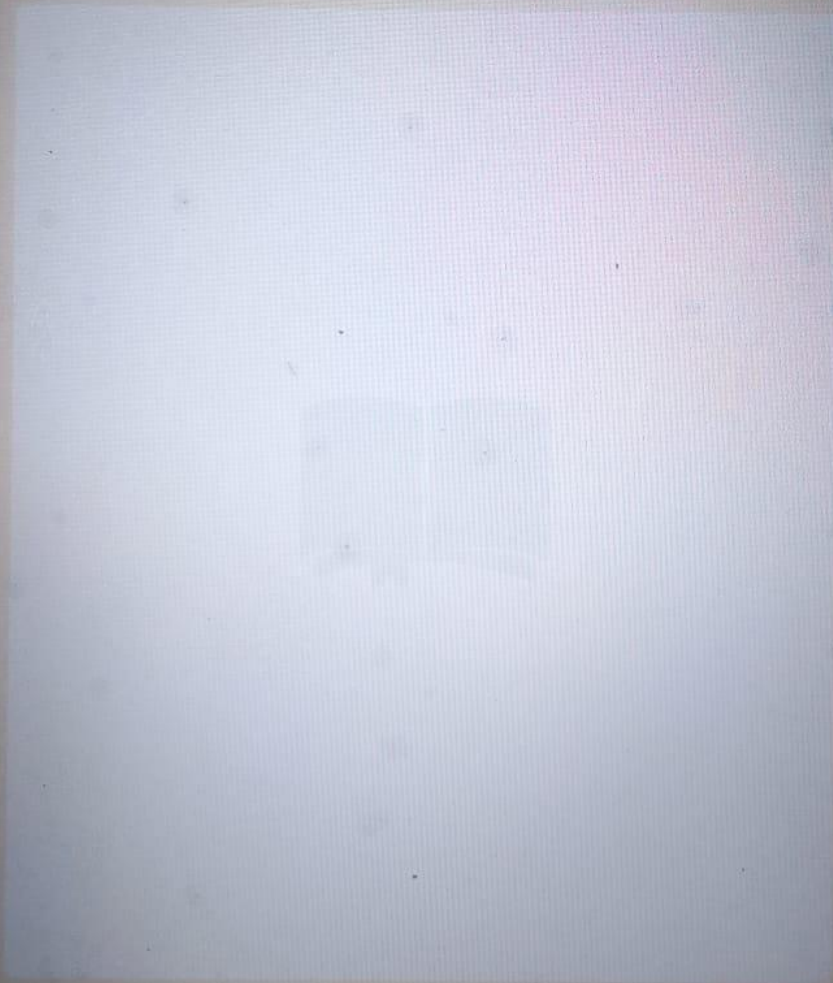

As the man at the window table finished his meal and prepared to leave, the anxious man approached him quickly.

With almost a plea in his voice, the man said, "I've dedicated over twenty years to the company. My entire family depends on my salary. Please, I'm begging you, give me another chance!"

Brandon and Janet walked by the scene, instinctively
